Although mountain bikes and racing bikes are both bicycles, their construction differs in many ways ___1___ the purposes for which they are intended. ___2___, a mountain bike has thick, knobby tires and reinforced wheel rims which are designed for off-road or rough road riding; these thick tires hold very little air pressure, making them extremely flexible and able to withstand the impact of hard and/or sharp objects in their path. The mountain bike also has a very thick, durable frame that is able to withstand much punishment ___3___ cracking, breaking, or chipping. The mountain bike's straight handlebars, which provide better control over rough terrain, also improve rider comfort ___4___ the rider remains in an upright position at all times. Mountain bikes also have wide seat, which provides excellent cushioning and a relatively comfortable ride under all conditions. ___5___, the racing bike has very thin, smooth tires, mounted on light alloy rims, which allow greater speed due to less friction with the road; ___6___, the bike must be ridden only on smooth pavement and not on rough or uneven surfaces. ___7___, the frame is extremely thin and lightweight, allowing greater speed and less wind resistance. The downward curving handlebars on the racing bike force the rider to remain in the tucked position at all times, drastically reducing wind resistance ___8___ increasing speed. ___9___ the racing bike has a very narrow, uncomfortable seat, it, too, reduces the bike's weight and wind resistance. When deciding ___10___ to buy a mountain bike or a racing bike, one must consider his or her purpose for using the bike. For off-road or rough road riding, the heavier, sturdier mountain bike is the logical choice, exchanging speed for durability. However, for smooth surface touring or competition, the lighter, faster racing bike is much more efficient.
