The detailed information and requirements are listed below. According to the World Health Organization, 640 million people in the world are disabled and 80 percent of these live in developing countries. Sadly, people with disabilities are often rejected by their communities, especially children. Families may hide disabled children and exclude them from family activities. Without special treatment and education, they tend to become the poorest of the poor. Therefore, the main aim of our organization is to provide a variety of programs to help the disabled people with different needs. With your great help, those disabled people can become part of socially and economically. Please sign up one of the programs today. Work with us. We can make our world better.

Option 1: Volunteer position in horse-assistance therapy for disadvantaged youth, Maracaibo, Venezuela.

Anyone with an interest in working with horses and children can apply. No horse experience is needed but a love of children is necessary. Enthusiasm and a willingness to learn is a must. The children that attend our center have emotional and behavioral issues, learning disabilities and vision, speech, and hearing difficulties. Responsibilities for the volunteers include assisting with the feeding and grooming of the horses, cleaning the stables and the equipment and keeping photographic and written record of the children's progress.

Option 2: Volunteer position with the Deaf Society, Bangalore, India

You do not have to know sign language in order to volunteer. Your love, energy and time given to children will be deeply appreciated. The main duties include helping create plays to encourage children to interact with each other, creating visual-based exercises for children through art and play and leading dance classes.

What Is Happiness By Shannon Cooper--Life Magazine

More than two thousand years ago, the philosopher Aristotle once said that happiness seemed to be the most important goal that all human pursued. In other words, people want money, success and health in order to be happy. So, the question is what is the best route to happiness? Economic measures have traditionally been used to evaluate wealth and success, which has been considered as the possible link to happiness. However, Bhutan, a small country hidden in the mountain has done differently. Bhutan's king, Jigme Singye Wangchuck, has emphasized that final success is not the only way to bring happiness. The emotional, spiritual and environmental well-beings are more important within Bhutanese society. In addition, every culture and every individual has a definition of happiness. Whether we view happiness from a philosophical or economic perspective, happiness is personal and complex but truly important to all of us.

To: Shannon Cooper
From: Leona Carlin
Subject: Feedback of reading "What Is Happiness"

Dear Shannon,

After reading "What Is Happiness," I can't agree with you anymore. Thus, I would like to share another example of Philip Leakey and his wife, Katy Leakey, who gain their happiness from learning-centered life instead of fame and money. Philip, is the third son of the famous paleoanthropologists Louis and Mary Leakey, was raised in the Kenyan bush. He spent his childhood on absorbing in all kinds of experiments in the bush where he found his true happiness. He started a series of small business there and became the first white Kenyan to be elected to Parliament after independence, serving there for 15 years.

Now, Philip and Katy live in a remote mountain camp, four hours south of Nairobi near the Rift Valley. They have created many experimental projects with a burning curiosity. This is the way they pursue their content and satisfaction, which means the true happiness for them.

Best regards, Leona Carlin
